We have a legal duty to promote equality in relation to race, disability and gender. We are also required by law to assess the impact of any Council policies on the different equality groups in order to eliminate or reduce any adverse impacts on these groups.

Whilst the sexual orientation monitoring questions may be sensitive for some people and there may be a reluctance to answer these questions, we do need to at least ask them. If people do not want to answer them, for whatever reason, they do not have to. Over time it is hoped that more people will answer these (and the other monitoring questions) in order that the equalities work that is carried out throughout the Council can be better informed and make a difference to employees and service users alike.

Sexual orientation is one of the 6 equality strands as set out by the Government in legislation. As such we must not discriminate against a person on the basis of their sexual orientation. In order to know whether or not we are discriminating we need to know the make up of both the workforce and the public that we provide our services to, as the law applies to employees and the general public. This means we have to monitor both groups so as to have some baseline figures of the composition of both groups. From this we can then build in more substantive questions in order to build up a more detailed picture of the impacts our policies, strategies and services are having on these groups.

Furthermore, there is a legal requirement to carry out Equality Impact Assessments on services, policies and strategies and in order to do this the first stage is to ensure you have all of the necessary data available to be able to assess the impacts on the minority groups.
